Step 3: Build an End User Profile for the Beachhead Market

General Exercises to Understand Concept

1. Pick a successful product that you know well. Who do you think the target end user is for that product? Write down the demographics and psychographics.

Demographics (your guess): _____

Psychographics (your guess): _____

Now go to the product's website, and look up advertisements for the product in the media, and see if the message there is consistent with your profile. Do the end users depicted look like what you expect them to? Is the product appealing to the priorities of your profile?

Demographics (per website/ads): _____

Psychographics (per website/ads): _____

What messages, images, proxy products, and other factors give you hints as to the product's end user profile: _____

2. Politicians and their teams are extremely aware of "end voter" profiles. Pick two candidates who are competing directly against each other in a current or recent election, and try to define each candidate's "base," their core group of voters, which is analogous to beachhead market. In doing so, look at the candidates' contrasting messages and images and notice how they reassure and attract these people to the candidate.

	Candidate 1: _____	Candidate 2: _____
Demographics of Base:
Psychographics of Base:
"Proxy products" – what things do members of the base actually do in their lives that demonstrate they might be inclined to support the candidate?

What watering holes do members of the base frequent?
What is the biggest fear or motivator of their base?

Now that you know the profile of the end user, you can assess future interactions you have with potential customers to determine whether they are actually in your end user profile, and are worth your time, or do not fit the profile, in which case engaging with their needs will distract you from building a great product to meet a specific customer pain. And you can now estimate how many end users exist in your market, which leads us directly to Step 4, Calculate the Total Addressable Market (TAM) Size for the Beachhead Market.
